MOBILES EVERYWHERE

The mobile phone is one of the most popular inventions of the twentieth century. Ask any teenager. How many of your friends have a mobile phone (o, as the Americans say: cell phone)? Or perhaps a better question is: how many of your friends haven't got mobile phone? It's a fact that most British teenagers now have a mobile phone.

Of course, it's not only teenagers who have got mobile phones. Mobile phones are much cheaper today than they were a few years ago, so when you walk through the town center, it seems that everyone is talking, from grandchildren to grandparents! When you sit on a train, you can hear hundred different conversations. There are thousands of different ringtones (piece of music you hear when somebody calls you) so you can hear your favourite music every time someone calls. You can send text messages to your friends for a few pence. You can take photos or even videos and show your friends where you are, what you're doing and who you're with. You can even use your phone when you go on holiday to other countries.

But not everyone loves mobile phones. Some people say they are expensive to use and there are some people who think that world was a better place before mobile phones. They don't like having conversations on trains, in the street or in a restaurants and they don't want to hear other people talking all the time. If you don't like mobile phones, the best place to go is an aeroplane – you can't use mobile phones on planes because it's dangerous.
